Loss of resistance of an inbred mouse line to a transplacental infection with Mycoplasma pulmonis. Female C57BL/6 mice exposed to M. pulmonis in utero gave birth to normal-appearing neonates which did not seroconvert and survived to adulthood. These animals exhibited no gross pathological changes and responded normally to a host immune challenge. Neonates exposed to a lower dose of the parasite (1 embryo per mouse) were severely affected: 3 of 6 died perinatally and 1 died at 1 wk of age. An average of 2 of 6 mice born from mice infected with 2 M. pulmonis embryos died perinatally (1--5 days of age). The results of the study show that the lack of effects following low-dose infections are not due to the host animal itself, nor are they due to a mechanism that limits the development of the parasites within the mouse. Neonatal deaths following low-dose infections were associated with histological and immunological changes in the placenta and fetus. Fetal involvement
